767	Victoria and Malcolm McPherson	Oppose in Part	5280-1	The New Zealand Institute of Architects	General	Chapter G General provisions	G2.4 Notification	Amend activity statuses to acknowledge that as the city intensifies a rules based system should give way to a more discretionary system. This should be implemented (i) by requiring a resource consent for more development proposals with a discretionary design review to be the norm for a greater proportion of developments; and (ii) by making more applications non-notified under the RMA and introducing a simpler, cheaper and less confrontational means of community consultation process outside the RMA framework.

767	Victoria and Malcolm McPherson	Oppose in Part	5280-11	The New Zealand Institute of Architects	RPS	Urban growth	B2.1 Providing for growth in a quality compact urban form	Acknowledge that the PAUP has had significant residential intensification removed from it when compared with the draft Plan. There is a need to relook at all the methods providing for and restricting residential intensification including the spatial location of residential and business zoning, overlays including the volcanic view shaft, height sensitive areas and heritage and character areas if the aspirations of the Unitary Plan are to be achieved [refer to page 9-10/39]. This should include the minimum site frontage of 7.5m; a minimum front setback of 2.5m to 5m (not 4-5 m which is too restrictive); the 'alternative height in relation to boundary control' (rule 7.4 and 8.4) which applies for a length of 12m along side boundaries; and the ability to build up to the side boundary for that length [as the alternative height in relation to boundary makes no sense with the 1m side yard control [in rules 7.5 and 8.6]. To maintain and enhance the rural production system the PAUP must: Recognise Nationally Significant Rural Land, Provide for Regionally Significant Rural Production, Achieve Economic Development Targets. Protect the Food Supply and Support Post Harvest Production. Rural production systems are dependent on the locational advantages Auckland provides through the high quality land resource, rural water resources and for the horticultural sector: post harvest activities including packhouses and under-glass protected cropping horticultural activities. The rural economy supports communities and rural production defines much of the rural landscape. '

Fruit, vegetables, livestock and forestry supply our domestic and export market. There are also as well as substantial mineral resources. 768	Number 8 Trust	Support	5431-16	Horticulture New Zealand: Pukekohe Vegetable Growers Association	RPS	Issues	B1.1 Enabling quality urban growth	Add new text 'There are long-term consequences of prolific subdivision across rural areas, the fragmentation of productive land, the domestication and commercialisation of rural landscapes, the introduction of sensitive land uses into working environments and the inefficient use of developable land. Inappropriate choices on greenfield expansion will also compromise regionally significant rural production systems. Around 5.5% of New Zealand's productive land resource is versatile land. Versatile land is land suitable for high value horticultural production because it has a range of enabling factors such as high quality soil, water, frost free climate, shelter, access to labour, transport, close markets and an enabling rule framework that discourages subdivision and land fragmentation.'

768	Number 8 Trust	Support	5431-17	Horticulture New Zealand: Pukekohe Vegetable Growers Association	RPS	Issues	B1.1 Enabling quality urban growth	Add new text 'Between 1990 and 2008 29% of New Zealand's available versatile land has been converted to new urban areas. Urbanisation is a trend that is unlikely to be reversible. Marlborough (59%), Hawke's Bay (49%), Waikato (36%) and Auckland (35%), have seen the highest level of conversion. Planning mechanisms focussed on soil protection have been unhelpful because they indirectly target the problem which is subdivision for rural residential purposes. There are two things that are required to prevent further degradation of the versatile land resource: Maintenance of an operating environment that encourages rural production activities on versatile land, and Prohibition or prevention by other means of subdivision for rural residential purposes on versatile land. Greenfield expansion must not compromise the regionally significant rural productions systems. Inappropriate choices could lead to the removal of versatile land from the production system or constraints on production activities, through reverse sensitivity effects, particularly at the RUB interface.'

The approach of the Unitary Plan is pivotal in achieving this target.. 2% to 3% of Auckland's GDP is attributable to agriculture and agricultural services and processing from the region. This is about $1.22 billion annually. The value of Auckland's rural land for rural production extends beyond the territorial boundaries and influences the national wellbeing of New Zealand. Over the past 20 years, horticulture exports have grown from $NZ 200 million to $NZ 2.23 billion. The area of horticultural crops has also increased 40% to 121,000 ha in just over 10 years. 768	Number 8 Trust	Support	5431-32	Horticulture New Zealand: Pukekohe Vegetable Growers Association	RPS	Issues	B1.7 Sustainably managing our rural environment	Amend Issue to read 'The rural environment is a large part comprises the majority of the Auckland landmass. It is important for its primary production; natural and physical resource base; significant indigenous biodiversity and natural landscapes; social, economic and cultural value to the urban and rural communities and Mana Whenua; amenity values and rural character. Subdivision, use, and development of rural land are greatly influenced by its proximity to the metropolitan area and the planning mechanisms Council puts in place. The interrelationship between urban and rural Auckland needs to be recognised and managed, to provide for existing and future generations. Auckland contains nationally significant rural land and regionally significant rural production systems that provide food, work and economic prosperity for New Zealand's existing and future generations.'
768	Number 8 Trust	Support	5431-33	Horticulture New Zealand: Pukekohe Vegetable Growers Association	RPS	Issues	B1.7 Sustainably managing our rural environment	Amend Explanation to read 'Rural production, from livestock to viticulture, is a key contributor to our economy. ... Rural character and amenity values and character complement and support the metropolitan environment. ... Managing the competing nature of activities on rural land, the impact of urban growth, the need to increase the value added to the Auckland economy by rural production activities and the desire to live in rural areas creates challenges for how our rural areas function. There are locational reasons why the rural sector is so productive in Auckland related not just to the quality of soil but also access to freshwater, transport linkages, gas supplies, post harvest facilities, access to labour, the proximity of the market and a diverse land parcel structure. There is a need to preserve areas of rural production for rural production and provide for growth and sustained access to land and water. There is also a need to ensure land owners have flexibility to change rural production land use activities and that the regulatory regime is practical and supportive. Food security is paramount for future generations.'

We want to enable the production of primary produce for export and local consumption to continue and expand in terms of its contribution to the regional and national economy and for food security. However, our rural areas are also under pressure to accommodate a wide range of different activities. Land use, development controls and discharge controls can affect rural production activities. Rural production can also conflict with the expectations of those wanting a rural residential lifestyle, creating reserve sensitivity issues. There are also potential conflicts between productive rural activities.'

To support a compact city form, and retain the values character of our rural areas, we need to distinguish between activities that must have a rural location, those that will have a negative effect on rural values character and those with more location flexibility. Earthworks can also involve elements of clean filling which is the deposition of inert no-hazardous material to enact land form change and this does not include material imported to a site for driveway, track or hard stand construction or maintenance and drainage works. The management of the adverse effects of earthworks under the PAUP focuses on both large and small disturbance areas, as the cumulative adverse effects from a number of small earthwork sites can be as significant as single large areas of exposed earth.'

The soil is not relocated and the activity is different to earthworks. However, as with earthworks, cultivation also exposes soil to rain and wind and requires an appropriate management response to ensure rural production activities are not inhibited and the life supporting capacity of the soil resource is protected. There are a number of best practice land management techniques that can be used to reduce the amount of sediment entering water bodies during the land development process from land disturbance activities. These form the basis of the earthworks PAUP controls. However even with the use of best practice, it is not possible to prevent all sediment entering water bodies.'

To maintain and enhance the rural production system the PAUP must: Recognise Nationally Significant Rural Land, Provide for Regionally Significant Rural Production, Achieve Economic Development Targets, Protect the Food Supply and Support Post Harvest Production. Rural production systems are dependent on the locational advantages Auckland provides through the high quality land resource, rural water resources and for the horticultural sector; post harvest activities including packhouses and under-glass protected cropping horticultural activities. Fruit, vegetables, livestock and forestry supply our domestic and export market. There are also as well as substantial mineral resources. 772	Tiare Family Trust	Support	5431-16	Horticulture New Zealand: Pukekohe Vegetable Growers Association	RPS	Issues	B1.1 Enabling quality urban growth	Add new text 'There are long-term consequences of prolific subdivision across rural areas, the fragmentation of productive land, the domestication and commercialisation of rural landscapes, the introduction of sensitive land uses into working environments and the inefficient use of developable land. Inappropriate choices on greenfield expansion will also compromise regionally significant rural production systems. Around 5.5% of New Zealand's productive land resource is versatile land. Versatile land is land suitable for high value horticultural production because it has a range of enabling factors such as high quality soil, water, frost free climate, shelter, access to labour, transport, close markets and an enabling rule framework that discourages subdivision and land fragmentation.'
772	Tiare Family Trust	Support	5431-17	Horticulture New Zealand: Pukekohe Vegetable Growers Association	RPS	Issues	B1.1 Enabling quality urban growth	Add new text 'Between 1990 and 2008 29% of New Zealand's available versatile land has been converted to new urban areas. Urbanisation is a trend that is unlikely to be reversible. Marlborough (59%), Hawke's Bay (49%), Waikato (36%) and Auckland (35%), have seen the highest level of conversion. Planning mechanisms focussed on soil protection have been unhelpful because they indirectly target the problem which is subdivision for rural residential purposes. There are two things that are required to prevent further degradation of the versatile land resource: Maintenance of an operating environment that encourages rural production activities on versatile land, and Prohibition or prevention by other means of subdivision for rural residential purposes on versatile land. Greenfield expansion must not compromise the regionally significant rural productions systems. Inappropriate choices could lead to the removal of versatile land from the production system or constraints on production activities, through reverse sensitivity effects, particularly at the RUB interface.'

The system is complex and diverse and involves a number of integrated elements. For example in the horticultural sector the production system requires access to land, soil, water, gas, transport linkages, post-harvest facilities, labour. Supporting rural production and the economic benefits it achieves is not just about protecting elements such as soil, it is about addressing the system as a whole.'
772	Tiare Family Trust	Support	5431-22	Horticulture New Zealand: Pukekohe Vegetable Growers Association	RPS	Issues	B1.2 Enabling economic wellbeing	Add text to Rural and Coastal Economy reading 'Developing and enhancing an innovative rural and maritime economy is an Auckland Plan target which seeks to increase the value added to the Auckland economy by rural sectors (including rural production, complementary rural enterprises, tourism and visitor experiences in rural areas) by 50% by 2040. The approach of the Unitary Plan is pivotal in achieving this target.. 2% to 3% of Auckland's GDP is attributable to agriculture and agricultural services and processing from the region. This is about $1.22 billion annually. The value of Auckland's rural land for rural production extends beyond the territorial boundaries and influences the national wellbeing of New Zealand. Over the past 20 years, horticulture exports have grown from $NZ 200 million to $NZ 2.23 billion. The area of horticultural crops has also increased 40% to 121,000 ha in just over 10 years. It is important for its primary production; natural and physical resource base; significant indigenous biodiversity and natural landscapes; social, economic and cultural value to the urban and rural communities and Mana Whenua; amenity values and rural character. Subdivision, use, and development of rural land are greatly influenced by its proximity to the metropolitan area and the planning mechanisms Council puts in place. The interrelationship between urban and rural Auckland needs to be recognised and managed, to provide for existing and future generations. Auckland contains nationally significant rural land and regionally significant rural production systems that provide food, work and economic prosperity for New Zealand's existing and future generations.'
772	Tiare Family Trust	Support	5431-33	Horticulture New Zealand: Pukekohe Vegetable Growers Association	RPS	Issues	B1.7 Sustainably managing our rural environment	Amend Explanation to read 'Rural production, from livestock to viticulture, is a key contributor to our economy. ... Rural character and amenity values and character complement and support the metropolitan environment. ... Managing the competing nature of activities on rural land, the impact of urban growth, the need to increase the value added to the Auckland economy by rural production activities and the desire to live in rural areas creates challenges for how our rural areas function. There are locational reasons why the rural sector is so productive in Auckland related not just to the quality of soil but also access to freshwater, transport linkages, gas supplies, post harvest facilities, access to labour, the proximity of the market and a diverse land parcel structure. There is a need to preserve areas of rural production for rural production and provide for growth and sustained access to land and water. There is also a need to ensure land owners have flexibility to change rural production land use activities and that the regulatory regime is practical and supportive. Food security is paramount for future generations.'
