2968	Tiare Family Trust	Support	5431-16	Horticulture New Zealand: Pukekohe Vegetable Growers Association	RPS	Issues	B1.1 Enabling quality urban growth	Add new text 'There are long-term consequences of prolific subdivision across rural areas, the fragmentation of productive land, the domestication and commercialisation of rural landscapes, the introduction of sensitive land uses into working environments and the inefficient use of developable land. Inappropriate choices on greenfield expansion will also compromise regionally significant rural production systems. Around 5.5% of New Zealand's productive land resource is versatile land. Versatile land is land suitable for high value horticultural production because it has a range of enabling factors such as high quality soil, water, frost free climate, shelter, access to labour, transport, close markets and an enabling rule framework that discourages subdivision and land fragmentation.'
2968	Tiare Family Trust	Support	5431-17	Horticulture New Zealand: Pukekohe Vegetable Growers Association	RPS	Issues	B1.1 Enabling quality urban growth	Add new text 'Between 1990 and 2008 29% of New Zealand's available versatile land has been converted to new urban areas. Urbanisation is a trend that is unlikely to be reversible. Marlborough (59%), Hawke's Bay (49%), Waikato (36%) and Auckland (35%), have seen the highest level of conversion. Planning mechanisms focussed on soil protection have been unhelpful because they indirectly target the problem which is subdivision for rural residential purposes. There are two things that are required to prevent further degradation of the versatile land resource: Maintenance of an operating environment that encourages rural production activities on versatile land, and Prohibition or prevention by other means of subdivision for rural residential purposes on versatile land. Greenfield expansion must not compromise the regionally significant rural productions systems. Inappropriate choices could lead to the removal of versatile land from the production system or constraints on production activities, through reverse sensitivity effects, particularly at the RUB interface.'

The approach of the Unitary Plan is pivotal in achieving this target.. 2% to 3% of Auckland's GDP is attributable to agriculture and agricultural services and processing from the region. This is about $1.22 billion annually. The value of Auckland's rural land for rural production extends beyond the territorial boundaries and influences the national wellbeing of New Zealand. Over the past 20 years, horticulture exports have grown from $NZ 200 million to $NZ 2.23 billion. The area of horticultural crops has also increased 40% to 121,000 ha in just over 10 years. Managing the competing nature of activities on rural land, the impact of urban growth, the need to increase the value added to the Auckland economy by rural production activities and the desire to live in rural areas creates challenges for how our rural areas function. There are locational reasons why the rural sector is so productive in Auckland related not just to the quality of soil but also access to freshwater, transport linkages, gas supplies, post harvest facilities, access to labour, the proximity of the market and a diverse land parcel structure. There is a need to preserve areas of rural production for rural production and provide for growth and sustained access to land and water.
